MARKETING CAMPAIGN

“The Seed’s Passport”

Signature Launch Campaign — Ancient Grain, Modern Palate

01

Campaign Name

“The Seed’s Passport”

A name that does double duty: it's the literal conceit of the campaign (a single seed's journey through four countries) and a metaphor for the brand's whole positioning — proof of where the flavor has genuinely been, not a marketing embellishment.

02

Big Idea

The most well-travelled seed in India never left the country.

Makhana has spent centuries in the wetlands of Bihar, entirely still — offered in temples, eaten during fasts, never once positioned as worldly. The campaign's tension lives in that contradiction: an ingredient this rooted, this local, this humble, somehow tastes like it has genuinely been everywhere. We're not asking people to believe fox nuts are exotic — we're asking them to believe flavor can travel even when the ingredient doesn't. That's a more honest, more ownable claim than any competitor's, because it's true: the seed stayed put, the flavor didn't.

03

Campaign Message

“One seed. Four worlds. Zero compromise.”

This is the line every campaign asset should anchor to — poster, video, social caption, OOH headline. It's short enough to survive a 6-second skip, and it carries all three of the brand's real claims (single ingredient, global flavor range, full-chain organic integrity) without spelling any of them out literally.

04

Creative Concept

The campaign is built around a single visual conceit: a makhana seed as a stamped, well-worn passport. Every touchpoint — poster, video, packaging insert, social post — treats the seed as a traveller with a stamped page for each flavor world it has “visited”: an ink-stamp motif for India (Smoke & Pepper), Japan (Golden Sesame), the Middle East (Pom Rose), and Italy (Truffle Rosemary). The joke and the emotional hook are the same thing: the seed's passport is full, but the seed itself never left Bihar. All the travel happened in the recipe.

Every execution follows the same narrative shape: open on the seed in its plainest, most unassuming state (raw, dry, ordinary) — then reveal, through a stamp, a spice cloud, or a scene transition, the specific world that flavor draws from. The reveal is always earned through real ingredient specificity (amchur, kinako, za'atar, truffle salt actually visible or named), never through generic “exotic” imagery like flags, landmarks, or costume.

The campaign closes every asset on the same idea, worded differently depending on format: this is what happens when an ancient grain refuses to be boring — not by pretending to be something else, but by proving purity and adventure were never actually opposites.

05

Visual Language — Campaign vs. Evergreen Identity

Where the evergreen brand identity is calm, editorial, and restrained, this campaign is allowed to be more theatrical — a heightened, campaign-only register that should never bleed into the core brand system.

- Passport/travel-document motifs (ink stamps, stitched borders, boarding-pass-style type) appear only in this campaign — never on core packaging or the evergreen visual identity.
- Each flavor world gets a distinct, saturated color grade drawn from its existing flavor accent color, pushed further than the brand's usual restrained palette for campaign drama.
- Macro photography leans more cinematic and high-contrast than the evergreen brand's soft editorial style — closer to a travel-documentary look than a product-catalogue look.
- Typography stays anchored to the brand's Canela Display / Neue Haas Grotesk pairing, but campaign headlines can run larger and bolder than evergreen brand applications allow.

06

Copy Direction & Headlines

Tone: confident and a little wry — in on its own joke (a seed with a passport) without ever undercutting the seriousness of the organic claim. Headlines should read like they belong on a well-designed boarding pass, not a wellness-brand Instagram caption.

“Stamped in Bihar. Tastes like everywhere.”

“This seed has more stamps than your passport.”

“Four countries. One seed. No frequent flyer miles.”

“Proof that flavor travels faster than seeds do.”

Poster Concepts — One Per Flavor

Smoke & Pepper — “Stamped in Old Delhi.”

Visual: A single roasted makhana seed rendered large and central, one side of the frame marked with an ink-stamp graphic reading “INDIA” in a travel-document style, smoke curling from smoked paprika and black pepper drifting across the frame like a street-food haze.

Composition: Vertical composition, seed placed slightly off-center, stamp graphic bottom-right, campaign message set in small type along the bottom edge like a passport footer.

Golden Sesame — “Stamped in Kyoto.”

Visual: The seed dusted in pale golden kinako powder, a single sprig of matcha-green color bleeding into the frame's edge, an ink-stamp graphic reading “JAPAN” rendered in a minimal, quiet, restrained style echoing Japanese design sensibility.

Composition: Wide negative space, seed positioned lower-third, calm and uncluttered composition contrasting with the boldness of the Smoke & Pepper poster.

Pom Rose — “Stamped in Beirut.”

Visual: The seed surrounded by a scatter of dried rose petals and deep-red pomegranate powder, an ink-stamp graphic reading “MIDDLE EAST” in a bold, sun-warmed color treatment.

Truffle Rosemary — “Stamped in Umbria.”

Visual: The seed resting on a dark, textured stone surface beside a single rosemary sprig and a shard of truffle, an ink-stamp graphic reading “ITALY” rendered in a deep, moody, earthen tone.

Composition: Tight, intimate macro composition, low-key lighting, stamp graphic small and understated in the corner — the most “quietly luxurious” of the four posters.

08

Social Concepts

The Flavor Passport Quiz

An Instagram/Story quiz that stamps the user's "flavor passport" based on their answers, ending in a personalized flavor recommendation and a shareable passport-stamp graphic card.

Seed's Passport Series

A recurring content series (Reels or carousel) where each post "stamps" a new country and unpacks one flavor's real ingredient story in under 60 seconds, building anticipation across a 4-part rollout.

Taste-Journey Duet Challenge

A Reels format inviting foodie creators to react, blind, to each flavor in sequence, guessing which "country" it's from before the reveal — built for duet/stitch-style organic sharing.

09

Advertising Concepts — Paid Social & OOH

Airport-Style OOH Takeover

Billboards and metro-station panels in Delhi, Mumbai, Bangalore, and Pune designed to mimic airport arrivals-board signage — each city's panel "announcing" a different flavor's country of inspiration alongside the campaign line, placed deliberately in actual transit hubs for a knowing, site-specific joke.

Paid Social Carousel: 'Boarding Pass' Format

A swipeable paid social carousel styled as a boarding pass, each card panel revealing one flavor's "destination," ending on a final card styled as a boarding gate call-to-action driving to the sampler pack product page.

10

Short-Form Video Concepts

Concept 1 — "Four Stamps" (20 seconds)

- 0:00–0:03 — Macro shot of a single raw makhana seed on a plain white surface, silent, still.
- 0:03–0:08 — Quick cut sequence: four ink stamps hit the frame in rapid succession (India, Japan, Middle East, Italy), each stamp accompanied by a burst of that flavor's spice/ingredient.
- 0:08–0:15 — The seed, now visibly roasted and seasoned, shown in a fast, rhythmic montage of all four finished products.
- 0:15–0:18 — Pack lineup reveal with logo.
- 0:18–0:20 — End card: "One seed. Four worlds. Zero compromise."

Concept 2 — “The Interview” (25 seconds)

- 0:00–0:05 — Mock-documentary style: a single makhana seed “interviewed” on a plain stool against a studio backdrop, a caption reading “Have you ever left India?”
- 0:05–0:08 — A beat of stillness, then the caption answers itself: “No. But it tastes like it has.”
- 0:08–0:20 — Fast cuts through each flavor's world-vignette (smoky Delhi street stall, calm Kyoto tea setting, sun-drenched Beirut spice market, moody Umbria kitchen), the seed's transformation shown in each.
- 0:20–0:23 — Return to the seed on its stool, now revealed as a finished, seasoned product.
- 0:23–0:25 — End card: “One seed. Four worlds. Zero compromise.”
